(From Our Regular Correspondent.)

Every man who knew the grant solder appears to have been a kind of Boswell, noting all his words and actions, and the result has been that every incident of his life, from early manhood to old age, has been preserved and transmitted to newer generations. There is no stronger evidence of the greatness of the man than this evident eagerness to treasure some word or deed of his for the purpose of passing it on to posterity.

By a new story, the newspaper man means, of course, a story which has not been printed. It is said that those related below have never before been put into type. Both of them were told during recent exercises at the University of Virginia, when the alumni from all over the country and the representatives of educational institutions of all sections assembled to attend the ceremonies marking the installation of the University.

Looking After "Poor Horses." "When I had taken my master's degree at Washington and Lee during the presidency of General Lee," said Professor Charles A. Oraves, of the University of Virginia law school, "I became an instructor in the law department. One structor in the law department. One morning General Lee met me on the campus, and, in his kindiy way, saked me how I was getting on. I replied that I was making it very well, but made some allusion to the dull boys in the class.

"Mr. Graves,' said General Lee, in his quiet, scriobs manner. 'I hope you will follow the stage-driver's rule.'

"What is that? I asked. I could not see how any rule of the driver of it stage coach could be of value to a law teacher.

lowing of the advice given him by General Lee.

"General Lee was the most accomplished manager of men, if that be the right term, that I have ever known," said Professor Graves. "I have been walking with him when we would see a student approaching. The General would ask me the name of the young man, where he was from, whether he by a prents were living, and how he was standing in his classes. When the student met us, General Lee would speak to him, calling him by name; would ask when he had heard from his mother (we will say his father was dead); remark he was glad to hear he had shown a recent improvement in his class standing, and urge him to show the same advance the next month, and, wishing him a good day, would pass on. The boy would go his way, wondering that a man at the head of a university having six hundred or seven hundred students should have such detailed information concerning a unit of the student body. This had a powerful effect upon students, the belief that the personal course of each man in the University was being watched with such close interest by the president."

ably the finest type of gentleman this country has produced. When I have told my story you will not be surprised to know that Mrs. Merrifield is even a greater admirer of General Lee than I am. Some two or three years after the war, my wife, who was then a small girl, was staying with her mother one summer at the White Sulphur Springs. They met General Lee there, and he bocame very fend of the little girl, and she grew to be devoted to him. When my motherin-law that was to be came to leave the springs, she started early in the morning, when few of the guests were up. She and her daughter were in the omnibus, which had started from the hotel veranda, when General Lee hurried out of the door and to the vehicle, calling to the driver to stop. He gave my wife a photograph of himself, across which he had written his autograph. He bade her an affectionate farewell. She never saw him again, but that photograph is very nearly her most treasured possession." (Special to the Times-Dispatch.)
